

The World's Most Remote Hotel Gets a Luxury Makeover

by Talia Avakian August 24, 2016

Guests who stay here can get completely off-the-grid in style.

White Desert's Whichaway Camp, a boutique hotel with six specialized pods in the Dronning Maud Land region in Antarctica, sits tucked away in a remote terrain hosting a stunning scenery of ice waves and frozen lakes.

The hotel, which only operates during the months of November, December, and January, due to Antarctica's harsh weather conditions, revamped its space last year and will open its door to guests this November.

Each of the hotel's six pods got new wallpaper, plush furs, and radiant heaters above the bed to offer a cozy and opulent atmosphere.

For the 12 guests who get to stay at the camp, transportation begins with a five-and-a-half-hour flight from Cape Town International aboard an Illuyshin 76 intercontinental jet, which will land on an ice runway about 7 kilometers from the property.

Guests are then taken to their luxury pods via specialized 4x4 vehicles.

Options include a one-day trip at a price of $11,000, which includes activities that range from traveling to the edge of the continent to marveling at groups of Adélie penguins and exploring ice grottos.

They also offer an eight-to-ten day trip starting at 64,000 euros (about US$72,070), which includes a journey to the South Pole, viewing a colony of 6,000 emperor penguins, and a host of adrenaline-packed activities to choose from.

Reservations are first come, first serve, with six slots still available from November 18-29 of this year.

Talia Avakian is a digital reporter at Travel + Leisure. Follow her on Twitter at @TaliaAvak.